Experience

Jacob began his career as a special education teacher serving students with moderate to severe disabilities in Denver Public Schools, building a strong foundation in student-centered practice. He went on to hold multiple district leadership roles, where he partnered closely with school leaders and central office teams to improve programs and outcomes for students with disabilities through data-based decision making.

Jacob later served as a director at the Texas Education Agency overseeing statewide general supervision efforts that included differentiated monitoring, policy implementation, and large-scale technical assistance initiatives. In addition, he has designed and facilitated alternative licensure pathways for aspiring special education teachers and taught graduate level coursework at the University of Denver, contributing to the preparation of future educators and leaders in the field.
